Sailing Around the World

I Jon Sanders, an 81-year-old man, recently did something amazing. He became the oldest person to sail alone around the world. His trip began in Fremantle, Western Australia, and it lasted for fifteen months. It was his 11th time sailing around the world.

II Sanders' latest trip was very dangerous. The weather was difficult, and huge waves threatened to destroy¹ his boat. Freezing winds were another major problem. Originally, Sanders planned to be on the boat for eight months, but because of a series of COVID lockdowns², the trip took seven months longer.

III In an interview, Sanders explained why he went on this trip. "I wanted to warn people about the problem of plastic in our oceans³," Sanders said. "The public needs to know that the plastic in the ocean is terrible for ocean life." In order to show people how bad the problem was, Sanders filled bottles with ocean water from various places around the world. When he returned, he gave the water to scientists. After the scientists examined the contents of the bottles, they said, "In Sanders' bottles of ocean water, we identified almost every type of plastic that people have in their homes. We didn't know that there was so much plastic in the ocean!"

IV For Sanders, life at sea is very different from life on land. At sea, he eats mainly food from cans⁴, such as tuna and canned vegetables. Whenever he is able, he catches fish. He can't sleep much because he has to watch the waves, the winds and the weather. In fact, he needs to wake up every twenty minutes! At sea, Sanders is alone all the time, but fortunately, being alone isn't a problem for him. He says, "I'm happy to be by myself. I never feel lonely."

V At present, Sanders is back home in Australia after his long trip. He lives on his boat, which he keeps at the port in his city. For now, he can't imagine sailing around the world again. "But who knows? You can never say never," he says with a smile.
