The Grass Is Greener

Merry old England is the site of this not-always-so-merry comedy about a romantic clash between a British Earl and an American oil-millionaire. The Hugh and Margaret Wilson screenplay, adapted from their London stage hit, slowly evolves into a talky and generally tedious romantic exercise, dropping the semi-satirical stance that brightens up the early going.

A romantic triangle develops among the Earl (Cary Grant), his wife (Deborah Kerr), and a 'rip-roaring Grade A romantic' American millionaire (Robert Mitchum) who wanders off-limits into milady's drawing room during a tour of the Earl's house and promptly and preposterously falls in love with her, and she with him. Balance of the picture is concerned with Grant's efforts to woo his wife back to his side.

The uninspired screenplay has its staunchest ally in Grant, whose stiffest comedy competition comes not from his three costars but from Moray Watson, the butler.

There are some compelling views of the English countryside, and the incorporation of some of Noel Coward's memorable tunes gives matters a lift. The Grass Is Greener (UK, 1960, 104 mins, colour, PG)
