

THE GREAT TRADITION

You believe there is a link between all great writers, because each learns from the writers that came before. You prefer literature that has outlasted fashion.

You read the text closely, without wondering about the social context : you want to see how the art of writing has developed.

READER RESPONSE

You believe you understand the text through the connection made between words and your perception of their meaning.

You make the meaning by reading between the lines, predicting what will happen and seeing how the writer confirms and disappoints those expectations.

RUSSIAN FORMALISTS

You are interested in the literary devices used by the author, the 'form' or structure rather than the meaning.

You look at what the writer has done, rather than what the writing is about: notice the way the story has been told, the order in which the information is imparted and the 'tricks' the writer uses.

STRUCTURALISM

You are interested in literature as a system of codes rooted in culture that build a world rather than just describe it.

You look at how the text is constructed, what the text doesn't say as well as what it does and focus on the patterns in a text.

PSYCHOANALYSIS

You believe language denies us direct access to reality, instead creating our reality for us. You want to discover what is unconscious in the text.

You look beyond the superficial meaning to see what has been glossed over or repressed and look for emotional conflict.

FEMINIST LITERARY CRITICISM

You realise the literary tradition was created overwhelmingly by men. You focus on what the text shows of the power struggle between men and women

You want to read about women's experiences and explore how female writers interpret and use the literary and linguistic traditions differently to men.

MARXIST LITERARY CRITICISM & POST-COLONIAL LITERARY CRITICISM

You believe text is related to the social context of its author and the historical contexts in which it was written and read.

Likewise, you are interested in the struggle against injustice and oppression, chiefly between black and white. You look at what a text reveals about attitudes to social class, race and gender.

You want to read about the experiences of writers outside the Anglo-Saxon tradition.

GENRE THEORY

You believe you can only make sense of a text when you see it in the context of its generic tradition.

You classify literature into genre categories – types, e.g. thriller, comedy, romance – then judge it against the conventions of that genre. You decide on the genre according to generally accepted indicators and then measure the work against other works in that genre.
