

The Global Spiritual Impoverishment Culturalization Colonizing Narcissistic Surface- Level Transactional Societies

by Pedro Lima

A petty, delusional, insecure, and parasitic surface-level narcissistic society becomes consumed by comparison and competition. It creates frameworks, individual, collective, institutional, and corporate standards, rooted in deep unresolved fears of insignificance and irrelevance.

From this insecurity emerge curated and fragmented identities sustained by addictions, obsessions, and attachments to self-conditioning beliefs, habits, and scarcity-driven, self-impoverished mindsets.

Within this narcissistic dysfunctional societal landscape, self-abandonment, self-betrayal, and self-victimization become culturalized, institutionalized, and normalized.

Dishonesty, falsehood, deception, secrecy, manipulation, speculation, scams, plotting, propaganda, exploitation, and manufactured conflict begin to dominate the collective environment.

A spiritually ignorant and spiritually impoverished society then projects its inner turmoil, chaos, and darkness outward in order to avoid taking full accountability for its own inner state.

Rather than cultivating self-awareness, emotional maturity, and self-regulation, individuals and institutions become attached consciously and unconsciously to ego-driven patterns of control, validation, and external dominance.

The result is a culture where surface-level success masks profound inner disconnection.

These dynamics manifest in everyday life:

Worth becomes measured through titles, wealth, status perceived symbols, number of follower, or social fame and approval while inner development and emotional intelligence remain neglected.

People curate fragmented survival identities to appear successful, moral, righteous, or powerful while privately avoiding to heal unresolved wounds, insecurities, fears, trauma and inner conflict.

Institutions and corporations prioritize authority, hollow hierarchy, profit, corruption and influence over transparency, ethical integrity, honor and accountability for one's intentions and actions.

Cultural narratives glorify winning, humiliating, domination, and accumulation while discouraging genuine authentic empathy, compassion, collaboration, and collective well-being.

Endless obsession with consumption, entertainment, and digital comparison keep individuals externally focused and disconnected from their own inner development.

Rather than confronting unresolved emotional patterns, individuals and groups project their frustrations outward toward scapegoats, rivals, or perceived enemies.

Not because systems collapse on their own, but because individuals begin to self-remember and start to rely upon their inner knowing rather than curated false distorted parasitic indoctrinated ideologies, dogmas and binding hollow stories.

The frameworks of comparison, competition, status, and control only survive through individual and collective participation.

They feed on unconscious obedience, emotional immaturity, and the quiet agreement and consent of those unwilling to confront their own shortcomings.

The parasitic energetic illusion spell weakens.

The need to dominate fades when inner insecurity is faced.

The need to compete dissolves when self-worth is reclaimed.

The need to control others disappears when one learns to govern oneself.

No external authority can replace the inner authority of a conscious sovereign authentic soul. The transformation of a society does not begin in its systems. It begins in the courage of individuals who refuse to live disconnected from their true authentic selves.

Walk with awareness.

Walk with integrity.

Walk with the quiet silent strength, reliant in the inner knowing of someone who no longer needs the illusion approval to exist. Because the most powerful revolution is not against the world. It is the one that happens within.
