

The Economy of Self-Betrayal in Parasitic Societal Systems Through Engineered Dependency

by Pedro Lima

In narcissistic, parasitic, spiritually impoverished societies, money and power over others become the currencies of illusion, worshipped, pursued, and hoarded at any cost. Individuals choose to be dishonest, lie, deceive, manipulate, speculate, scam, and exploit, profiting and benefiting from the unconscious addictions, obsessions, and surface-level attachments of others.

Wealth is built not through integrity, conscious awareness, but through cunning, dishonesty, and spiritual ignorance curated through systems designed not to empower, but to entangle, distort, create dysfunction while profiting greatly from the chaos, conflict, and diminishment of another being.

Because sovereign, authentic souls who know who they truly are, who cannot be controlled or exploited, dependency must be engineered, indoctrinated, normalized, institutionalized, and culturalized, demanding the self-abandonment, self-betrayal, and self-deception of individuals in order to be accepted and approved by the parasitic people and their corrupt systems of dis governance.

Through individuals. Through corporations. Through societal systems at all levels. An Influencer culture rewards curated, fragmented identities, where authenticity is sacrificed for visibility, and self-worth becomes measured in the number of followers, likes, and views, dependent on external validation.

People learn to perform instead of genuinely and authentically self-express, to please instead of embody their sovereign inner truth, to shape-shift into whatever gains approval. The more disconnected the individual becomes from their true self, the more controllable they are.

Corporate systems study human behavior to capture attention, agreement, consent, to monetize from distraction, to keep individuals consuming, scrolling, comparing, and craving.

The mass levels of indoctrinated propaganda, marketing, and algorithms are not neutral; they are mirrors of conditioning human perception to exploit and profit at any cost, feeding addiction loops, reinforcing insecurity, and promoting content that triggers emotional dependency.

The product or service is not just what is sold; the product is the individual's attention, time, and the consent to have their life-force harvested, while feeding the filthy, oligarchical, self-serving, petty, greedy soulless "pockets".

Financial systems are created to bind individuals through debt, conditioning them to trade their time, energy, and creativity for survival. Paychecks become lifelines. Bills become pressure points. Fear of instability becomes a leash. The individual is kept too busy surviving to question the very same system they are sustaining, Educational indoctrinated systems condition obedience over discernment, training individuals to memorize, comply, and fit into predefined roles rather than question, create, or think independently.

Success is standardized, sterilized by preconceived beliefs and behaviors. Intelligence is measured by the number of titles, hollow hierarchical ranks, the amount of resources and money hoarded while authentic sovereign self-expression is oppressed, suppressed, and punished in favor of conformity, and subservience of individuals.

Social parasitic narcissistic people and their curated corrupt soulless structures reinforce comparison and competition, keeping individuals compliant, in constant measurement of their worth against others.

Status becomes a fragmented, curated identity construct. Titles become of higher value. External achievement becomes the substitute for internal alignment, inner coherence, and integrity.

Even spirituality, in these distorted parasitic systems, becomes commodified, turned into performance, hierarchy, and profit. Gurus, “experts,” and middlemen position themselves as gatekeepers of truth, wisdom, and authority, selling enlightenment while reinforcing dependency, subtly disempowering individuals from accessing their own inner knowing.

Across all layers, the pattern is the same:

Create lack. Exploit insecurity. Offer validation as currency. Maintain dependency.

The individual, disconnected from their own essence, begins to comply.

Seeking approval. Seeking recognition. Seeking permission to exist. Seeking a savior.

Curating fragmented survival identities to be liked, to be seen, to be worthy, to be accepted. Living according to expectations, opinions, and projected judgments of others. Afraid of rejection. Afraid of exclusion. Afraid of standing alone.

So they dim. They dilute their inner truth. They silence their authentic voice. They betray their inner knowing, and all for conditional acceptance. All to belong within a societal system that feeds on their disconnection.

But the cost is immense, because every time an individual abandons their authentic sovereign blueprint to fit into external demands, they move further away from themselves and closer to becoming a participant in the very system that diminishes them.

This is how life-force is harvested, through unconscious agreement and consent. Through the quiet surrender of authenticity. Through the normalization of self-betrayal. Through the illusion that validation must be earned externally.

But the illusion starts to be exposed the moment an individual remembers:

Nothing outside can define, validate, or complete what is already whole within.

The moment one stops seeking approval...stops performing...stops abandoning themselves to belong...The system loses its energetic influence.

Because a being who knows who they are beyond all the layers of self-conditioning.

The empowered soul walks differently.

It does not negotiate its truth for acceptance, nor dilute its essence to be understood.

It sees clearly without needing agreement, stands firmly without needing validation, and moves with quiet certainty rooted in inner coherence.

It does not seek permission to exist, to express, or to be, it knows.

It chooses integrity over approval, presence over performance, and alignment over attachment.

It honors its inner authority as the only true compass, refusing to be defined, owned, or fragmented by any system, ideology, or projection.

It can stand alone without feeling incomplete, because it is no longer searching for itself in the eyes of others.

It does not abandon itself to belong, because it belongs to itself, and in that unwavering self-devotion, the illusions begin to dissolve, through the simple, undeniable presence of a being that cannot be divided, defined, measured, that cannot be conditioned, and cannot be moved away from its own authentic sovereign truth.