

Comfortable Curated Social Lies, Fragile, Fragmented Egos, and the Rejection of Uncomfortable Truth

by Pedro Lima

I am not the destiny of anyone or anything, nor do I seek anyone or anything to be my destiny.

I am whole. I am enough. I am Sovereign. I stand up for myself unapologetically, amidst any external scapegoating projection, attempting to bind, require, or demand my self-abandonment and self-betrayal.

I am not defined by any external societal self-identity, curated, fragmented stories, or attachments.

I choose to connect only genuinely and authentically with sovereign beings who, like me, do not self-abandon, self-betray, or compromise their inner authority for the sake of playing fake, polite, “nice” societal manipulative petty games designed to perpetuate egoic, fragmented, pain-based identity curated survival attachments, based on conditional self-preserving fragmented distorted illusions.

Politeness has become a costume people wear to avoid confronting the truth, and the longer it is worn, the harder it becomes to remember and discern what is real.

Surface-level, phony kindness without genuine intention, integrity, authenticity, and truth is not connection; it is a quiet agreement to remain comfortably disconnected from oneself and from others.

The most effective form of control does not silence you; it conditions you to smile, agree, play nice, be safe, and betray yourself willingly.

“Being nice” becomes the social dynamics script used to keep truth unspoken and inner discomfort suppressed.

In a hollow societal landscape addicted to curated politeness, authentic sovereign truth appears disruptive, not because it is, but because it exposes the illusion.

Fakeness survives through mutual tolerance. Everyone sees it. No one names it, and the fragmented identity curated illusion dynamics remain intact.

A fake, polite society does not reject truth; it dilutes it, reshapes it, rebrands it, and repackages it until it becomes safe and secure enough to ignore. It labels this distortion as “order,” “justice,” and “safety,” reinforcing fear-based pain, curated identities, layers of conditioning, and egoic attachment to illusions.

What people call “keeping the peace” is nothing more than avoiding the raw truth that would expose and dismantle the curated, self-preserving illusion of individual and collective fragmented identity, beliefs, and patterns of behavior.

In everyday societal dynamics, this plays out in environments where people smile, agree, censor anyone who do not go with the “herd”, and maintain appearances while suppressing what is real, workplaces where integrity is compromised to protect image and status, social circles where honesty is replaced with passive agreement to avoid discomfort, and relationships where individuals withhold truth to maintain a false sense of harmony.

Over time, this sustains the lack of genuine mutual connection. Trust becomes conditional, communication becomes performative, and relationships are no longer built on authenticity, but on unspoken rules, needs, and agreements. In these societies, sovereign individuals who choose clarity, honesty, and self-aligned expression often stand out because they are no longer willing to participate in the performative, fragmented societal conditioning illusion.

It is precisely this refusal that reveals the difference between a genuine, authentic soul-to-soul connection rooted in truth and a hollow surface-level connection sustained by status, appearances, and curated egoic performance.

In its deeper societal layer, this “polite fakness disguised as social harmony” is reinforced by narcissistic societal narratives, frameworks that normalize self-abandonment under the guise of selflessness. Propaganda disguised as a superior morality that promotes the idea that self-sacrifice, self-silence, and emotional self-suppression are virtues, rewarded, while discouraging direct individual authentic sovereign truth expression, boundaries, and self-honoring genuine spontaneous expression.

This creates a subtle but powerful narcissistic dynamic where individuals are conditioned to override their own needs, intuition, and discernment in order to maintain a fragile sense of social acceptance.

Beneath the layers of curated appearance of social unity, there is an unspoken imbalance, where some benefit from compliance, emotional and physical labor, profiting from the silence of others, while calling it “order,” “cooperation,” “success,” or “goodness.”

In this way, false social harmony is maintained at the expense of authenticity, and exploitation is concealed behind socially approved narratives of kindness and self-sacrifice, while the one’s at the top of the Ponzi mob-like Societal hierarchies, false curated authority figures, who pull the strings, keeping others dependent on their approval and validation to an individual exist, live, behave, think, obedient, compliant, subservient and submissive to a false hierarchical corrupt institutionalized and normalized oligarchical parasitic exploitative system, where a few self-serving, petty, fragile, insecure beings, dictate and define how and what others can do, have or be, subjugating others to their self-serving, prideful ignorant greedy, hollow agendas, seeking to perpetuate the illusion of power over other beings, with individuals and a collective being complacent, agreeable, and consenting with their own self-disempowerment, and self-diminishment.
