

The Hollow Survival Game Played in a Spiritually Impoverished Narcissistic Society

By Pedro Lima

In a surface-level, ignorant, self-victimized, narcissistic, hierarchical, transactional hollow society, attachments to survival-based, self-preserving, self-serving, manipulative, and exploitative social dynamics consume, taint the hearts and minds of inner disconnected individuals and a fragmented collective low consciousness.

The collective clings to fear, pain, suffering, conflict, division, pride, hypocrisy, and performative, curated, deceptive self-serving narratives where the underlying question becomes:

“What can I take from others?”

“How can I benefit, profit, freeload, or gain leverage from another’s vulnerability, obedience, ignorance, or dependency?”

This hollow societal structure framework is sustained by individuals terrified of irrelevance and insignificance within a narcissistic status quo world addicted to comparison, competition, and performative inauthentic curated identity construction.

People compete to “keep up,” while internally collapsing beneath unresolved emotional wounds, insecurity, shame, guilt, sorrow, grief, emptiness, and fear of embracing vulnerability to grow, expand, evolve, and ascend.

Rather than confronting their inner fragmentation, they project outward, scapegoat others, and create self-serving, binding, parasitic narratives, smear campaigns, lying, deceiving, manipulating, and trying to control pain-based narratives that justify bitterness, envy, resentment, manipulation, and exploitation of others.

They fear silence because silence reveals what distraction conceals, exposes.

They also fear honest self-reflection because it exposes the false, curated identity built through conditioning, egoic attachment, and survival-based self-preservation.

The majority are conditioned to avoid emotional processing, accountability, and the transformation of pain, adversity, chaos, inner disconnection, and suffering into awareness, wisdom, resilience, growth, and sovereign, authentic inner power.

Instead, they are indoctrinated, trained, and taught to remain emotionally and psychologically dependent on external systems, identities, institutions, and false authorities for meaning, direction, validation, survival, and self-worth.

Everything becomes based on external perception management.

People judge, compare, project, obey, comply, and perform to maintain emotional comfort, security, belonging, and acceptance within oligarchical societal systems rooted in corrupt, false hierarchy, exploitative dependency, and engineered fear and scarcity.

Political ideologies divide to sustain themselves, their hollow thrones, and maintain themselves at the top of a rigged Ponzi, fragmented power. Religious dogmas shape and condition individual and collective obedience. Corporate systems exploit through labor and attention. Financial structures normalize debt dependency.

Educational institutions prioritize conformity, memorization, obedience, and the cultivation of followers dependent on institutional validation over emotional intelligence, sovereign thinking, creativity, self-awareness, and intuitive discernment.

Media systems amplify fear, outrage, and distraction, disseminating propaganda to trigger emotional reactivity.

All of it reinforces external false authority control over an individual's inner knowing, self-led by their own inner intuitive compass with integrity and honor.

Individuals become dependent on curated self-serving oligarchical petty exploitative profit-driven corporate narratives, dependent on institutional permission and societal validation to feel worthy enough to exist.

This nurtures self-deception, self-betrayal, self-abandonment, and fragmented pain-based curated fragmented identities that legitimize unconscious participation within shallow emotional and psychologically manipulative narcissistic parasitic societal games.

A lack of inner substance becomes normalized.

Materialism replaces meaning. Consumerism replaces presence. Curated appearances and performance replace authenticity. Addiction replaces awareness. External status replaces inner integrity. The collective unknowingly defends and sustains the very systems that diminish, exploit, and spiritually impoverish them.

Meanwhile, those positioned at the top of these Ponzi-like hierarchical structures engineer conflict, scarcity, dependency, and division while profiting from poverty, addiction, suffering, emotional instability, ignorance, fear, and collective unconsciousness.

Many have sold their souls' integrity for titles, status, influence, wealth, institutional false authority, and proximity to perceived superior power and status.

But beneath the carefully curated, hollow image lies deep insecurity, fragmentation, prideful ignorance, attachments, arrogance, and emotional emptiness, masked by a performative, dysfunctional illusion of superiority.

These hollow beings lack self-love, self-honor, self-accountability, humility, and the courage to confront themselves honestly and consciously.

So they misuse knowledge, distort truth, gate-keep information, manipulate systems for their benefit, and maintain corrupt surveillance structures that benefit centralized control while suppressing authentic self-awareness within the collective.

Political systems instigate division through ideological tribalism, turning human beings into reactive, curated identities rather than conscious individuals capable of discernment and solving their differences through honest and authentic dialogue.

Economic and financial structures normalize lifelong debt, engineered scarcity benefiting hollow, greedy, profit-driven corporations, and dependency, while glorifying endless productivity as a virtue, progress, and success, conditioning people to sacrifice their well-being, authenticity, and inner peace for survival within oligarchical, corporate, soulless systems that profit from their exhaustion and suffering.

Educational institutions prioritize conformity, memorization, obedience, and curating followers dependent on institutional validation over emotional intelligence, sovereign thinking, creativity, self-awareness, and intuitive discernment.

Even science and technology, when disconnected from ethics, integrity, consciousness, and humanity, risk becoming tools for surveillance, behavioral engineering, social manipulation, and centralized technocratic corrupt control disguised as progress, security, convenience, and safety.

Religious institutions, political parties, corporations, media systems, and financial hollow empires operate through the same underlying mechanism: convincing individuals they are incomplete, powerless, dependent, sinful, unsafe, unworthy, or incapable without external guidance, authority, permission, or middleman salvation.

This perpetuates a spiritually impoverished collective that remains psychologically and emotionally bound by fear, survival attachment, social conditioning, and the terror of standing alone in their own authentic sovereign truth.

The majority unconsciously defend the very structures that exploit them because questioning those systems would require confronting their own conditioning, attachments, unresolved inner wounds, and participation in the illusion itself.

But authentic sovereignty arises the moment an individual stops outsourcing inner authority, stops betraying their inner knowing for acceptance, and chooses to stand grounded in their inner authentic truth, integrity, discernment, compassion, and self-responsibility, even if it means walking away from everything built upon fear, scarcity, manipulation, dependency, and a false sense of belonging and conditional acceptance.

Self-liberation begins with the humility to honestly observe oneself without the need to perform, without self-denial, and without externalizing blame, becoming consciously aware of one's own thoughts, intentions, emotional reactions, attachments, inner wounds, and choices, while courageously transforming inner fragmentation into embodied awareness, presence, self-responsibility, compassion, discernment, and authentic sovereign soul inner alignment.

But authentic sovereignty arises the moment an individual stops outsourcing inner authority, stops betraying their inner knowing for acceptance, and chooses to stand grounded in their inner authentic truth, integrity, discernment, compassion, and self-responsibility, even if it means walking away from everything built upon fear, scarcity, manipulation, dependency, and a false sense of belonging and conditional acceptance.

Self-liberation begins with the humility to honestly observe oneself without the need to perform, without self-denial, and without externalizing blame, becoming consciously aware of one's own thoughts, intentions, emotional reactions, attachments, inner wounds, and choices, while courageously transforming inner fragmentation into embodied awareness, presence, self-responsibility, compassion, discernment, and authentic sovereign soul inner alignment.